NPDCI to Support the New Response to Intervention (RTI) Position Statement

Response to Intervention (RTI) has become a familiar acronym. However, because RTI is an emerging practice, there are a number of issues around its definition and implementation for young children in early care and education. Currently, there is little information or guidance related to RTI in early childhood for educators, administrators, teacher educators, families, policy makers, and researchers.

Three national organizations will address critical issues about RTI in early childhood in a jointly developed position statement. The Division for Early Childhood of the Council for Exceptional Children (DEC), the National Association for the Education of Young Children (NAEYC), and the National Head Start Association (NHSA) will work together over the next two years to develop this guidance. NPDCI will contribute staff time and resources to facilitate the development of the joint position statement.

Measuring the Quality of Inclusion
by Sharon Irwin and Elena Soukakou

How do we know if we are providing high quality inclusion for young children with disabilities? Join Sharon and Elena in discussing two new tools for measuring the quality of inclusion or preschool classes and programs. This is an early release of material to be discussed at the Inclusion Institute in May.

Christine’s Chronicles: Our Real Problem
by Christine Lindauer

My sister Stacy said something quite eye-opening to my mother. It reminded my family again why inclusion is so important and I thought I’d share it with you all. Christine began blogging about her journey with her son Luke after last year’s Inclusion Institute. Please join us in reading this month’s blog and looking back at posts from the past year.
